POST HEADQUARTERS

1941

G R E E T I N G S

To the officers and men stationed at Fort Bragg, I extend cordial greetings and good wishes. We are all here for the same purpose -- that of making ourselves fit and ready to defend this Republic in any emergency that may rear its head.

It is comforting to note the enthusiasm with which all of you tackle the jobs assigned to you. With such spirit and loyalty, there is no doubt in my mind that you will faithfully and efficiently fulfil any duty for which you may be called.

This is a great post. It has grown from 3,500 to 60,000 officers and men. All about you are the material evidences of the great strides that have been taken here to improve our national defense. We have in our hands the safety of our nation and I feel sure that if ever called upon, you will add even more glorious deeds to the record of the American soldier.

Sincerely yours,

Charles B. Elliott,

HISTORY OF FORT BRAGG

Situated on land that was first inhabited more than 200 years ago, Fort Bragg, an important installation for national defense, contains the largest field artillery range in the world. With its mild climate permitting outdoor training throughout the year over varied terrain, it is a splendid training center and on its extensive ranges field guns of the largest calibers may be fired with safety.

Located in the sandhills section of North Carolina between the Piedmont area and the coastal plain, the Fort Bragg Military Reservation is 10 miles northwest of Fayetteville and averages eight miles in width by 24 miles in length and contains approximately 122,000 acres. A branch line connects the post with the main line of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad at Fayetteville.

The post proper is located at the eastern end of the reservation due to the existence of level terrain there suitable for drill, maneuvers, post construction and airdromes. With an estimated 22,000,000 gallons a day being available at the waterworks intake station on Little River, an adequate supply of fresh water is assured.

SITE EXPLORED IN 1663

The land on which this modern military post is located was first explored by commissioners from Barbados who sailed up Cape Fear River in 1663, and it was first settled about 1729 by Highland Scotch, who still remain the dominant racial group. A slow but steady immigration of Scots followed in succeeding decades, with a great influx about 1749. Infrequent clearings supported the sparse population, whose principal means of livelihood was small farming. Great forests of long leaf and loblolly pine covered the area.

Within several decades after their arrival in 1729, the Scots had spread out into the area between Manchester and Cross Creek (Fayetteville). An especially promising section was the Long Street area, in the center of what is now the Fort Bragg reservation, located in Hoke and Cumberland counties. The Long Street community was favored by the beauty of the scenery, the fertility of the soil, the variety of the forest growth and the general healthful site of the locality.

Although these Highland Scots were industrious farmers, whose main occupation was the tilling of the soil, they became involved in the Revolution and were divided among themselves in the late 1700's with regard to political sympathy in the strife between the colonists and King George. In the early days of the revolution, a settlement of Whigs located in Piney Bottom was wiped out by the Tories coming from the locality now occupied by the City of Fayetteville. During the Carolina campaign, Lord Cornwallis, following his defeat by General Nathaniel Greene at Guilford Court House, retreated along the Yadkin Road which traverses the length of the reservation. Morgan, called the Swamp Fox, made this locality his headquarters, from which he carried on harassing operations against the British forces.

Following the revolution and the winning of independence for the colonies, the Highland Scots again farmed the land, but during the period from 1782 to 1862, the area and its inhabitants showed little change. In the War Between the States, this area was again the scene of military operations.

One of the last engagements in this conflict, brief but sharp in nature, took place at what is now called the Battle Field Farm on the Fort Bragg Reservation. It was here that the Confederate forces, commanded by Major General Wade Hampton, and the Union forces, commanded by Brevet Major General H. Judson Kilpatrick, met in conflict, and, on the Reservation, there are now small groups of graves of unknown Union and Confederate soldiers who gave their lives to their cause in that action. Annually, these graves are decorated with appropriate ceremonies by the Fort Bragg garrison with the assistance of local patriotic societies.

During the War Between the States, 107 men from the Fort Bragg area marched away to fight for the Confederacy, but only seven came back at the close of the war. In the years that followed, the land was almost depopulated, and not a child was presented for baptism in the Long Street Church for a full 16 years. Slowly the land commenced to revert to the wild state which characterized it when the early settlers first viewed it. As time passed, the process slowly reversed itself, although at the outbreak of the World War, half a century later, only seven per cent of the land was under cultivation and approximately 170 families were living in the area which eventually became Fort Bragg.

MILITARY RESERVATION

The history of this area as a military reservation began in June, 1918, when the Chief of Field Artillery sought a site for the establishment of an Artillery Firing Center having adequate artillery range, suitable terrain and soil, nearby rail transportation, adequate water supplies and a location as far north as possible but still where climatic conditions would permit year round training.

Major General William J. Snow, the Chief of Field Artillery, instigated a survey of the areas which might be appropriate for the establishment of artillery firing centers. Colonel E. P. King made a search throughout the Eastern part of the United States for such an area. In his account of this search, he stated in part:

"At that time, there were no road maps such as we have today and we found very few sign posts through the country. The geological survey had made very few maps in that section. We traveled principally by compass and dead reckoning . . . About six o'clock (the fourth evening), we drove into Manchester, North Carolina, along an unimproved sand road that ran along the north bank of Lower Little River . . . We stopped at a store in Manchester and asked the storekeeper where was the nearest place we could put up for the night. He directed us to Fayetteville . . . The first tract of land we found which bade fair to comply with our requirements was the watershed north of Lower Little River. We stayed at Fayetteville the fourth night and the next day examined the present site of Fort Bragg. We liked it so well that we went no farther. We remained in Fayetteville about a week going over this tract in great detail and laying out the lines, which, with certain alterations, are the present boundaries. Judge John G. Shaw, of Fayetteville, kindly consented to give us a great deal of his time and guide us."

LOCATING FORT BRAGG

The area selected begins at a point about 10 miles northwest of Fayetteville and extends westward for about 24 miles to the vicinity of Southern Pines. Averaging eight miles in width, the reservation contains approximately 122,000 acres. The post proper was located at the eastern end due to the proximity of the water supply and the existence of level terrain suitable for drill, maneuvers, post construction and for airplane landing fields.

The plan was approved by General Snow after a personal inspection, and, on July 1, 1918, he submitted a report to the War Department requesting the assignment of the site to the Field Artillery. This request was promptly approved.

The new camp was named Camp Bragg in honor of General Braxton Bragg, Confederate States Army, who was a native North Carolinian and had been a distinguished artillery officer in the War with Mexico.

Actual construction of Camp Bragg began September 16, 1918, and about $6,000,000 was expended that year for the purchase of land. Erection of cantonments was planned for six brigades but cessation of hostilities in the World War changed these plans. The War Department recognized that no existing Field Artillery training area except Camp Bragg was of sufficient size to permit training in the firing of heavy caliber and long range artillery weapons developed during that war, so it was decided to continue Camp Bragg but to reduce it to a two brigade cantonment to provide a garrison for Regular Army units and a training center for National Guard artillery units. One company of the 46th Infantry was Camp Bragg's first garrison.

With Camp Bragg completed by the Constructing Quartermaster about February 1, 1919, artillery personnel and material were transferred there from Camp McClellan, Alabama. Although 1919, the year following the World War, was a period of demobilization, construction was completed, and lumber, trash and scrap material left by the contractors cleaned up. Military personnel took over the clerical work at post headquarters from war-time civilian employees. In 1920, little military training was conducted at Camp Bragg.

In 1921, the 17th Field Artillery, which is still there, arrived at Camp Bragg on January 9, and on May 19, 1921, the 13th Field Artillery Brigade was organized at the post.

On August 23, 1921, the War Department, in reorganizing the Field Artillery, ordered the abandonment of Camp Bragg, but through the efforts of the post commander and civic organizations, the Secretary of War came to Camp Bragg and inspected the facilities, and on September 16, 1921, the orders directing the abandonment of Camp Bragg were revoked.

FIELD ARTILLERY BOARD

On February 1, 1922, Army Regulations changed the station of the Field Artillery Board, an agency devoted to research and testing of new artillery weapons, from Fort Sill, Oklahoma, to Camp Bragg, the Board's present station. On September 30, 1922, Camp Bragg was designated a permanent establishment of the Army and named Fort Bragg. Parade grounds were finished, roads improved and game preserves set aside.

The years from 1923 through 1926 constituted a period of valuable training for artillery regiments at the post. Units were recruited up to peace strength, with many of the non-commissioned officers having seen war service. The men were contented and many enlistments were from nearby points. A great deal of time was spent on field training, the vast expanse of the reservation being admirably adapted to this purpose.

Great progress was made by the motorized regiments of Field Artillery in learning how to handle this comparatively new type of transportation in deep sand, heavy mud, swamps, streams and forests. The Field Artillery Board turned over to the various regiments new, experimental types of vehicles, weapons and equipment, making Fort Bragg a laboratory as well as a training center.

During the period from 1927 to 1931, new construction was begun that has aided in making Fort Bragg one of the finest of Army posts. Four of the permanent brick barracks buildings were constructed then, as well as 53 officers' quarters, 40 non-commissioned officers' quarters, a modern water supply system with cast iron mains, storm and sanitary sewers, nurses' quarters, magazines and motor and material sheds. By the end of 1931, $3,000,000 had been spent on new construction.

It was also during this period that all occupied temporary buildings of World War construction were painted and most of the unoccupied ones torn down. In 1930, the new barracks were made attractive by planting lawns, shrubs and trees. Streets, sidewalks and the road from the post to the reservation limit were paved, and the drainage system completed. The Fourth Field Artillery arrived from Fort Robinson on June 9, 1931, and construction of the regiment's new stables was finished in 1932. The Station Hospital was also begun and completed in 1932.

From 1932 to 1940, beautification of the post was stressed, and additional brick barracks buildings were erected. Also constructed during this period were the Post Headquarters, Chapel, Theater, Field Artillery Board, Post Ordnance Shops, Commissary, Quartermaster Office, Guard House and Signal offices.

During this period, regiments stationed at the post were furnished with modern motorized equipment and the latest type weapons. They trained with other arms and services in Third Army Maneuvers in 1938 and 1940.

PRESENT DEVELOPMENTS

Such was the history of Fort Bragg on June 1, 1940, when the garrison strength was 5,406 officers and enlisted men, but during the months which have passed since that date, Fort Bragg has added many more interesting pages to its already interesting history. By mid-summer of 1940, the Post personnel began to expand and early in September a new building program was started, involving the construction of approximately 2,478 buildings at a cost in excess of $32,000,000. The number of workmen on the job ranged from the original group of approximately 5,000 to more than 23,500, with a daily payroll in excess of $100,000. These buildings will accommodate a garrison totaling more than 67,000 officers and enlisted men, making Fort Bragg North Carolina's third largest city.

As this building program is such an important part of the history of Fort Bragg and its development into an even more important part of national defense, a fairly detailed account of it will be given here.

As time was an important element in this construction, it is well to note that the timely procurement of building materials and orderly planning of the program in advance of actual construction contributed largely to the speed with which the work was accomplished. As soon as construction was authorized by the War Department, roads were built and ground cleared, electricity was then made available for lighting and for operation of high speed electric saws in each area.

An efficient communication system involving four switchboards and 13 operators was established, and water mains were laid to each area so that water might be available for both building purposes and fire protection. During the construction period, an average of more than 1,000,000 board feet of lumber moved into Fort Bragg daily.

In addition to the roadway already built, much of which was improved, widened or rebuilt, approximately 75 additional miles were built to take care of additional traffic and to open up new areas. Fifty miles of sewage lines and more than 40 miles of new water mains were laid. The Fort Bragg water plant, which had an original capacity of approximately 2,500,000 gallons per day, has been increased to 7,000,000 gallons, and water storage facilities originally 1,500,000 gallons have been doubled. The Fort is assured of an adequate water supply from the 22,000,000 gallons of water which flow by the intake station on Little River daily. Fifty miles of new power lines have been erected, and sub-station facilities increased in line with the increase in power needs of the reservation.

In order to make living conditions as comfortable and pleasant as possible, the largest number of buildings constructed were for the purpose of providing living arrangements for the rapidly increasing garrison, which has sprung from the 5,500 officers and men at the post in mid-summer of 1940 to a final total of more than 67,000. Included in the new construction are more than 800 barracks buildings, each having interior latrines and circulating heating systems. The Post now has quarters for more than 1,600 officers and mess halls sufficient to take care of the personnel.

RECREATION BUILDINGS ERECTED

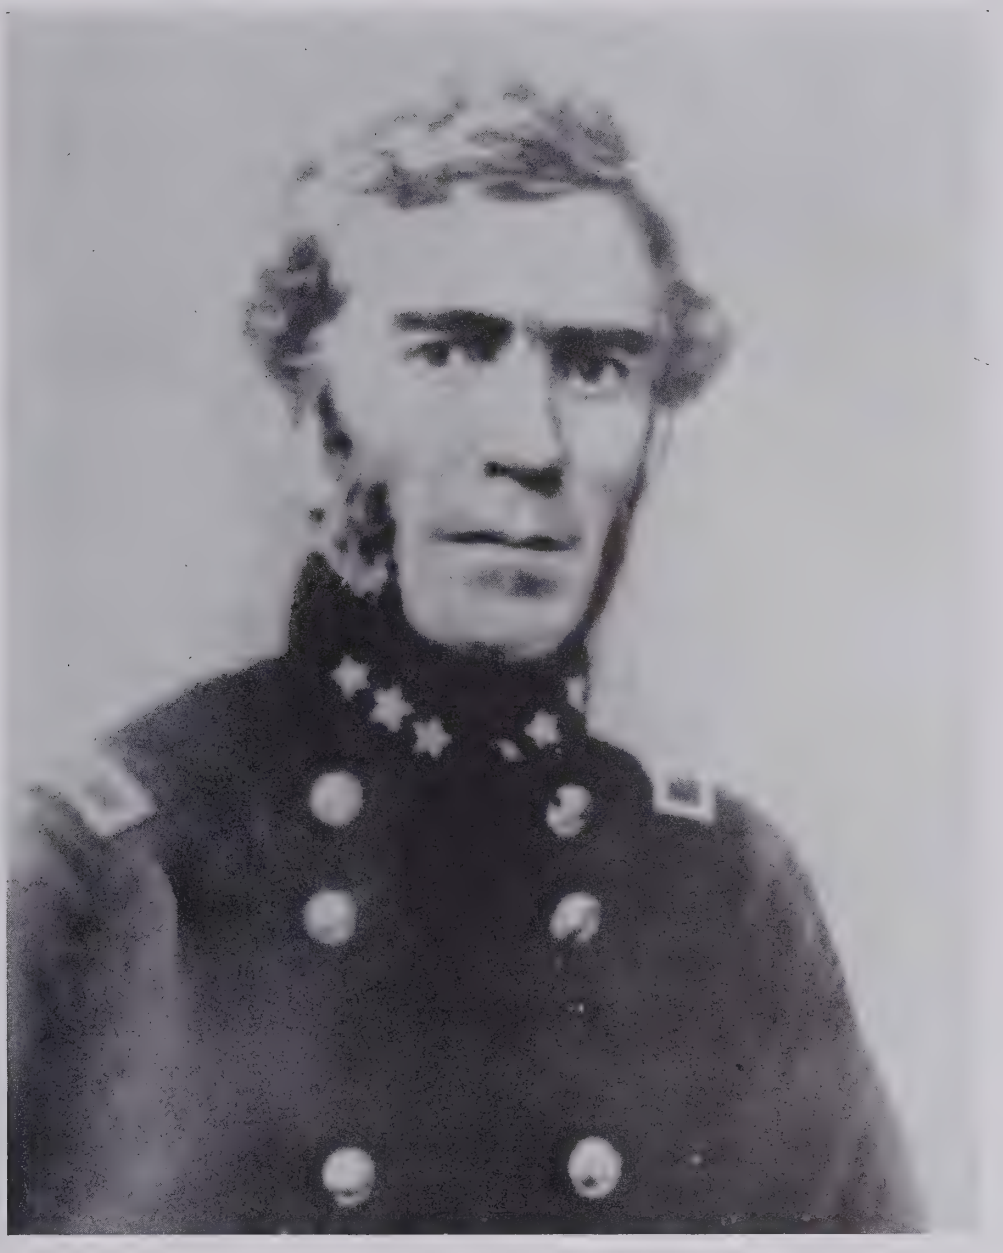

Adhering to the old adage that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," the authorities have provided recreational facilities to care for the needs of the personnel, including day rooms, post exchanges, recreation buildings, theaters, guest houses and Service Clubs. Each of the Recreation buildings has a stage, dressing rooms, facilities for motion picture projection and seats for 500 people, which may be removed leaving the entire floor for dancing, or for use as a lounge or other recreational purposes. The theaters will seat 1,038 people each. The guest houses contain living rooms for the Hostesses and for visitors. A cafeteria and a large dance floor are parts of the Service Clubs. They are well equipped and capable of furnishing many hours of wholesome recreation and relaxation.

To take care of the physical well-being of the people stationed at Fort Bragg, a large hospital, 18 separate infirmaries and a large Dental Clinic were included in the construction program. The hospital covers an area of 2,680,000 square feet, has a total of 83 wards, with 1,680 beds immediately available and capable of expansion to 2,000 beds if needed. The hospital project consists of a total of 112 buildings, with a total of 75 doctors and 240 nurses.

Scattered throughout the Post are a number of fire stations, each housing three vehicles, giving to Fort Bragg all the facilities of a modern city.

Already considered the largest Field Artillery reservation in the world, Fort Bragg has been and still is one of the most important installations of our national defense, not only because of the many organizations stationed at the post but also because of the fact that modern developments in field artillery have had their inception and field proving under actual service conditions over its extensive terrain.

Now, with the arrival of more combat units at the Post, the responsibilities of Fort Bragg are daily increasing, but the officers and enlisted men stationed at the post feel confident that they will be well equipped and fully prepared for whatever may come. They are justly proud of Fort Bragg and its brief but important history. It has served its purpose well in the past and promises to be of even more importance and value in the future.

GENERAL BRAXTON BRAGG

Fort Bragg, established as Camp Bragg in 1918, is named for General Braxton Bragg, who was born in Warren County, North Carolina, March 22, 1817, and was graduated from West Point in 1837. He was appointed a Second Lieutenant of the Third Artillery and served with distinction under General Taylor in the Mexican War, retiring to private life in 1856.

At the outbreak of the War Between the States, he was appointed a Brigadier General, C.S.A., and subsequently took an important part in the two-day battle at Shiloh. On the death of General A. S. Johnston, he succeeded to command with the rank of full general. His chief success was at the battle of Chickamauga, where he defeated General Rosecrans but was in turn defeated by General Grant, an event which led to his temporary removal from command in 1864. Later that year, he assumed command of the Department of North Carolina.

He died in Galveston, Texas, September 27, 1876.

FIELD ARTILLERY BOARD

In the 36th year of its existence, the Field Artillery Board, Fort Bragg, North Carolina, is engaged in more important and more varied activities than ever before in its history. It has at its disposal an immense firing area, suitable for the long range weapons frequently under test, and a varied terrain for road and cross-country operation of test vehicles. In addition, the garrison includes field artillery organizations armed with weapons of calibers from 37 millimeters to 240 millimeters, thus making available trained personnel to handle any type of field artillery weapons that may be furnished for test.

The Board consists of eight Field Artillery members and the Post Ordnance Officer at Fort Bragg, who is an active voting member. The inclusion of the Ordnance member is essential, due to the many tests of Ordnance materiel and equipment, and to the additional fact that, as Post Ordnance Officer, he commands an excellently equipped ordnance shop, where test items can be modified and the damages incident to test may be investigated and repaired.

Field Artillery Board Building.

There is no formal division of the Board into sections, though the membership always includes at least one officer specially qualified in motors and one in communication. Tests are, in general, assigned to the member or members whose experience best qualifies them to handle the matter. Often a sub-committee of the Board is formed for tests of unusual importance. All the members participate in every test to the extent necessary to familiarize themselves with the salient features of the device under test and to see for themselves the good and bad points. Under this procedure, the officer conducting the test has the assistance and advice of the other Board members in determining the character and extent of the test, and bases his statement of results of test on the concensus of the members.

R. S. PARROTT
Colonel
President of the Field Artillery Board

When appropriate, test materiel is assigned to organizations stationed at Fort Bragg for use in service, under Board supervision, and the opinions of the officers of the organization are obtained. These opinions naturally carry much weight in the determination of the suitability for service use of the test device, since the using organizations can be expected to take the liveliest interest in the characteristics of material destined ultimately to be assigned to them for use.

At the conclusion of the test, a formal report of test is prepared by the member assigned to the test, and is presented before the Board for critical analysis, correction and final approval. These meetings are characterized by intensive comment and discussion by members, whose several opinions must be brought in agreement and expressed to their satisfaction in the report, or, if this is impossible, submitted as minority reports. Often doubt as to the reliability of the data secured during the test requires reopening of the test to clarify the points at issue. Every effort is made to render reports that are clear, complete and conclusive, in order that the Army of the United States may have the best of weapons.

SPORTS

It takes more than a long, hard day in the field or on the drill field to dim the competitive spirit of the American soldier—they play as hard as they work, the competition is keen and sportsmanship is at its best.

All around the calendar, soldiers at Fort Bragg engage in seasonal sports, from basketball in January to football in December. Swimming, baseball, tennis, volleyball are just a few of the many sporting activities that occupy the spare time of the men.

In the post athletic league, all organizations send their members to represent them, to show the athletic prowess of their organizations, but mainly to engage in friendly, competitive contests, marked by the highest type of sportsmanship.

From checkers to "dramatic" presentations, from informal songfests to musical shows, the soldiers at Fort Bragg find their opportunities for recreation, for filling off-hours with laughs and entertainment, for displaying the famous American sense of humor.

Amateur shows, featuring strictly local talent and all-male casts, uncover in the ranks outstanding interpreters of song and dance, of drama and humor. Everyone does his share of contributing to the entertainments, even to the risk of female impersonations. It's good, clean fun and worth a lot to tired soldiers.

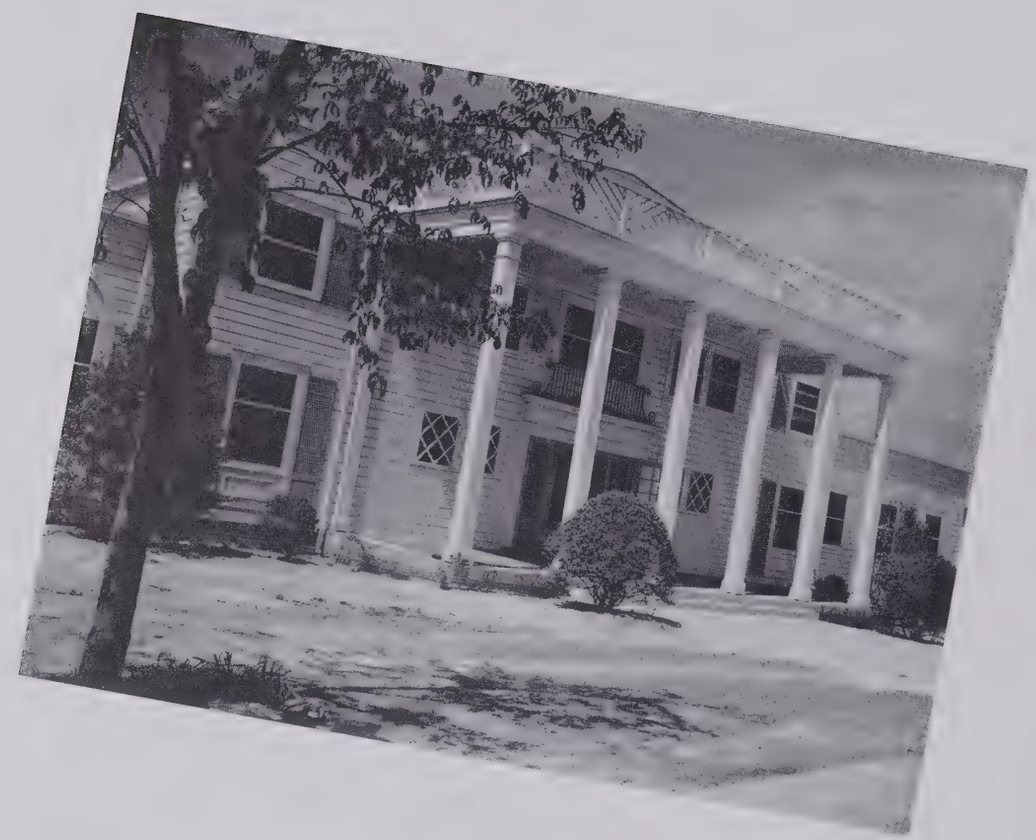

Supplementing the bigger entertainment features are the games offered in the service club or the day-rooms—games like checkers and ping-pong. There is always something for a soldier to do, and being an American soldier, he is always doing something.

34th COAST ARTILLERY BRIGADE [AA]
Fort Bragg, North Carolina

July 7, 1941

To the Officers and Men of the 34th Coast Artillery Brigade:

Our brigade, the only anti-aircraft unit at Fort Bragg, is a young organization, both in point of brigade history and in point of brigade personnel. Time alone will bring seasoning, experience and action, and with them will come accomplishment and recognition. We are dedicated to the goal that the 34th Coast Artillery Brigade shall be unexcelled among units of the Army of the United States, and with a continuation of the spirit which now prevails in this brigade, that goal will be reached.

It is a pleasure for me to extend these greetings to the officers and men of my headquarters and of the three regiments. It is my hope that the achievements and conduct of the units of this brigade will be an inspiration to similar organizations of the Army.

Sincerely,

Claude M. Thiele

History

34TH COAST ARTILLERY BRIGADE (AA)

After the three regiments which constitute this brigade had been activated and had been undergoing training for several months, they were officially constituted as the Provisional Coast Artillery Brigade in December, 1940. At that time, there was no change in the program of training, except that planning and execution of the brigade's training activities were thereafter supervised by the brigade commander.

At the time of the formation of the provisional brigade, all units were housed in tents. During the winter months, the weather was mild and no serious discomfort was caused by the cold. Throughout the period when the troops were under canvas, the health of the command was excellent.

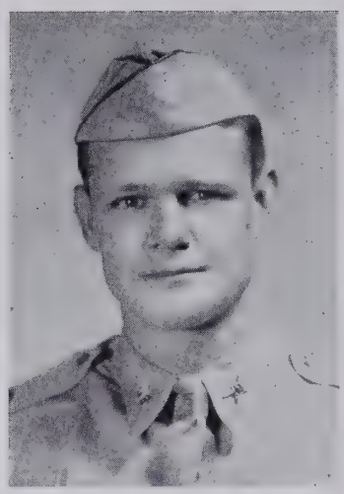

So far, only the first battalion of each of the regiments had been activated. During the months of December, 1940, and January, 1941, the primary objective of the brigade was the development of the enlisted personnel of all the active battalions into competent instructors, specialists and anti-aircraft artillerymen of all types required for the formation of cadres, which would be required upon the activation of the remaining units of the regiments and of the brigade headquarters battery. As it was known that the strength of all the regiments would soon be tripled by the assignment of untrained selectees, all other activities were subordinated to the training of cadres.

During the month of February final preparations were made for the reception of the selectees. On February 10, the second battalion of each regiment was activated, enlisted cadres for the new units being provided by detachments from the then existing units. All regiments moved into newly completed cantonment buildings; supplies and equipment were gone over to make sure that they were adequate and in good condition, and all buildings and grounds were worked on to make them more sightly and usable. On February 10, 1941, an order was issued by the War Department announcing the activation of the Brigade Headquarters and Headquarters Battery, 34th Coast Artillery Brigade, and the official formation of the brigade under authority of the War Department.

During the month of March, the selectees arrived and were promptly started on their course of training. In a surprisingly short time they were performing military duties with skill and snap. Intensive training is still under way; and the interest displayed by all, the esprit de corps, and the willing application of all ranks to the task at hand clearly indicate that no matter what is asked of it, this brigade will be well prepared.

GREETINGS:

TO ALL WHO OPEN THESE PAGES

It is an honor and privilege to extend to the officers and men of the 77th Coast Artillery (AA) my sincere thanks and good wishes. Thanks for the hearty cooperation which has made possible our splendid progress. Good wishes to all, especially to our newest members who form the bulk of our organization.

The 77th Coast Artillery (AA) is a new regiment. It has no background of battle laurels or historical achievements as do some of our neighbors. We are making our history now, so let us strive to make a history of which we shall be proud.

We have been assigned a distinctive regimental insignia, one which is easily distinguished from all others. As long as we wear the silhouette of Cincinnatus, we are marked men.

Our motto is "Par Omnibus Operibus," which means, equal to every task. As we work to that end may we do so with enthusiasm.

INSPECTION OF THE 77TH COAST ARTILLERY IN REGIMENTAL AREA AT FORT BRAGG.

HISTORY OF THE 77TH COAST ARTILLERY (AA)

When colored troops were authorized for the Coast Artillery early in the summer of 1940, the first battalions of the 76th and 77th Coast Artillery (AA) were organized at Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

The First Battalion, 77th Coast Artillery, was activated at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, on August 1, 1940, pursuant to authority contained in a letter, AGO, July 20, 1940. No enlisted personnel and only two officers were present at the activation of the battalion.

ORGANIZATION

First four officers to report were Captain Charles G. Young and Major Logan O. Shutt, who reported on August 1; Lieutenant Colonel Riley E. McGarraugh, who reported on August 2, and Captain Joy T. Wrean, who reported approximately one week later.

A cadre of 103 Regular Army men from the 25th Infantry, Fort Huachuca, Arizona, began arriving about August 10, 1940. Among this cadre were five of the first three grades, C.A., who reported on August 10, two coming from Harbor Defense of Pensacola, one from Narragansetts Bay, one from Harbor Defense of Delaware and one from Harbor Defense of Boston. These men and the other men on the white non-commissioned staff played an important part in the founding of the organization and have contributed their share to the smooth functioning of the outfit.

Recruits began arriving on August 18, coming from the VI Corps area, principally from around Chicago and Detroit. The battalion was soon up to authorized strength of 524. Included on the training program were regular garrison training, parades and firing on the target with the .30 caliber rifle.

The first selectees received by the organization, a total of 17, arrived on December 21. On March 4, another group of 145 selectees were received and all were assigned to the Second Battalion. On March 5, another group of 165 selectees arrived and all were assigned to the First Battalion and Regimental Headquarters Battery. The regiment reached its full authorized strength on March 31, 1941, following the activation of the Second Battalion and Regimental Headquarters on February 10, 1941, authority for which was contained in Paragraph 2, Letter, AGO, dated December 16, 1941.

A NEW COMMANDER

Colonel Claude M. Thiele reported to the regiment early in September, 1940, and two weeks later was ordered on a special mission to England. He remained in England as a military observer until the middle of December, returning to the United States just before Christmas at New York and reporting back to the organization on January 11, 1941. Upon his return, he assumed command of the Provisional Coast Artillery Brigade, which on February 10, 1941, was activated into the 34th Coast Artillery Brigade. He has been succeeded in command of the regiment by Lieutenant Colonel Riley E. McGarraugh.

When the 77th was first organized at Fort Bragg, it was quartered in the C. M. T. C. area of the post, living in tents, but on Wednesday, February 18, 1941, it moved to the present regimental area and into cantonment barracks.

Despite the fact that it was a newly organized outfit and was quartered in a tent city, the regiment, through the efforts of its officers and men, showed a rapid rate of progress, training the recruits in various duties. The effectiveness of this training is demonstrated by the fact that three cadres have been sent from the regiment since its organization. The first cadre, composed of 38 men, left on February 18 for the Quartermaster Depot being established at Camp Lee, Virginia. On March 1, 84 men were sent to Camp Wallace, Texas, and another cadre of 168 men went to the 100th Coast Artillery at Camp Davis, Holly Ridge, North Carolina.

Although the regiment has been engaged in an intensive training program, time has been found for recreation and sports, with a varied sports program being supervised by Lieutenant F. J. Anneberg, athletic officer.

"EQUAL TO EVERY TASK"

The first main event on the athletic program was a cross-country race on Thanksgiving Day, with each battery entering a team of six men. This race was won by Battery C, although the first two individual places were won by men from Battery D—Private Claude Prince, first, and Private Henry Williams, second.

Also prior to the Christmas holidays, there was an inter-battery basketball tournament in which the competition was very keen. After a nip-and-tuck battle, the tournament was won by Battery C. During January, several of the battery basketball teams from the regiment competed against the Fayetteville State Teachers' College in Fayetteville, North Carolina. The results of these contests were very close, with neither side holding a decisive edge.

These games were followed in February by an elimination tournament for the championship of the colored troops at Fort Bragg between the 76th and 77th Coast Artillery regiments and the 41st Engineers. On February 27, at the post gymnasium, the 77th played and defeated the 76th, then followed this victory by one over the 41st Engineers on February. These two victories gave the 77th the championship of the colored troops.

At both work and play, the men of the 77th have proved themselves to be at the top. In a short space of time, they have established an enviable record for the regiment. They have indeed lived up to their motto—Equal to every task.
